Power Returns to Nashville Airport

Jay Harrington

As of 12:36 am on Sunday, March 24th, power has returned to the airport. But officials say that the facility is not out of the woods yet. The raised tensions caused by the flight delays and cancellations have put citizens camped out at the airport on edge. With the return of electricity, the tension has begun to migrate towards anger at the continued delays, but Chief Patterson has said increased delay is necessary.

“We still do not know what has caused the prolonged power outage at the airport,” Patterson told reporters over the phone, while he was on site at the Nashville International Airport. “We also do not know who, if anyone, is behind this, or why the power has been restored. My officers have requested my presence directly in this, as the number of hostile individuals could cause the scene to tip into chaos.”

Patterson could not reveal any further information at this time, but the situation at the airport seems to be growing into a larger fervor, with citizens, both business and casual, begin to but heads with officers.

Juli Mosley has convened and emergency meeting of the Board of Commissioners in one of the airport’s conference rooms to discuss the matters. Though the meeting is closed-door, Mosley has guaranteed reporters a brief summary of the discussions after the meeting is concluded.

“I don’t understand the hold up,”

Steven Gaines said, a businessman from Kansas City, in town to visit family. “My flight was supposed to leave three hours ago, and was at the terminal when the power went out. Now that the power is back on, they still won’t let us through, citing unfounded concerns about safety and some hidden investigation no one is talking about.”

Gaines isn’t the only person voicing these concerns, and the outbound terminal is spread out with people camping out, or trying to push past officers. With a situation as tense as this, any spark could result in a revolt.

The personnel at the Nashville Chief-Gazette will continue to monitor the scene, with further updates being provided live at our website, chief-gazette.com.

RECENTLY...

The airport darkened, the police and TSA closing in, and a mysterious chair sucking the life from the airport. The Interrupts seem to have a total gridlock hold over the airport, even with their Nero Chair destroyed and the demiplane it resided in collapsing. The power is back, but what is next for our intrepid adventurers, trapped in the airport with the police and TSA agents outside the only exit?

Previously- With Charles fearing for the safety of his Sept, and the Interrupts taking over the airport and the Internet, the Sept raced off to find the culprits, and how to take them down. In addition, a cemetery has lost connection with the Umbra, where the spiritual lands now lead only to the Darklands.

ANNOUNCEMENTS

This is a continuation of the last game. Any players that were unable to make it to the last game will, by Gaian magicks, be with the party so that no one is left out.

The Enraged Corebook is well on it's way to completion. More updates will be provided when they are available.
